OK.

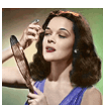

You ever think about you and me going to Vegas, retiring on the proceeds? Leave the world-saving business and setting up in someplace hot with blue water and yellow sand? I'd make a fabulous bikini-clad expatriate.

Man. Don't even think that too loud.

What? It's not illegal to use what's in your head to beat the house. It's not like I'm suggesting mechanisms.

It's not the illegal that worries me. It's the fact that they don't care if they can prove you're doing it in a court of law.

Casinos still have back rooms, you know.

Corporate gangsters! Worse than the other kind!

Okay. So if you really, really needed a lot of money in a hurry, what would you do?

...do I?

I mean, is this a hypothetical situation? And am I me, or somebody who is a good friend to me, or somebody who is nobody in particular?

Totally hypotophoethical.

Say Harpy or I needed fast cash. Or you did.

...I'd talk to my good friend Chaz.

Because he has an angle. Which he prefers to save for emergencies, because it's also not illegal.

o.

ok.

...curiosity compels me to look questioning and hopeful, however?

Hint?

Orbits and trajectories are predictable, if you can do the calculations fast enough.

It's just physics.

Oh.

Duh.

So if I need a brain transplant (which, requiring a referral to a specialist not on the approved list, i.e., a Mad Scientist, is not covered by my otherwise excellent government medical benefits), I might be able to beg for help from my friends and not despair of the outcome? *g*

(I wonder what Mad Scientist's fees are like nowadays? All that malpractice insurance...)

I think we could guarantee whatever help you needed, under those circumstances.

I don't recommend Belize. Sticky, large insects, much coming and going of small aircraft on impromptu airstrips chopped out of the jungle. Tends to interrupt one's naps.

So where would you go?

I am an employee of the United States Government, so I would never go anywhere near Cuba.
